Bram Stoker was an Anglo-Irish writer who created the basis for modern vampire stories and tales about the undead with his 1897 novel Dracula. His Dracula is now considered one of the great Gothic novels and was certainly an influence on later writers such as J. Sheridan Le Fanu (1814-1873) who used the same conceit and device in Carmilla (1872). George T. Fechter (b.1849) wrote the stage version of Dracula, which had the well-known line "Dracula came from Transylvania." ("And he was the devil!") in 1897, and John Balderston (1849-1919) adapted it for the screen in 1910 in London. It was then turned into a series of seven American silent films, each 20 to 25 minutes long, including the 1910 Dracula by William Paul and his 1915 The Unholy Three by F. Richard Jones. The New York Times called the novel "the most popular book in England". It is the story of Mina Harker, who is introduced in the novella Dracula. Mina soon discovers that her family friend, Jonathan Harker, is being haunted by Dracula in his sleep. The story follows his attempts to get rid of the vampire.

The ruins are also quite popular with tourists. Im not really sure whether they are scared by Bram Stokers influence or if they find the site mystical; however, they do seem to draw a lot of visitors. As Dracula stalks up the steps, we can see he's definitely an impressive figure.

The monochrome images of him clearly make us realise that he has some kind of dark presence. You can even find some of the same things Stoker saw when he visited Whitby over a century before. There are bones found in Whitby Abbey that look just like vampires. As the college tour moves on to the museum, one of the guides says: Ive heard of Whitby in the past; Ive heard of it in the past. In the early 1800s, Whitby was one of the first places in England to use gas lamps. Not only is it weird to imagine a place filled with coal gas lamps which glow like lighthouses, but that's also amazing to know that it's the very same place that Bram Stoker was inspired to create his novel. In his novel, Stoker describes a baron named Laurent Murgos who keeps "a tiny gas lamp always burning upon his writing table". He says it is the reason why Murgos has written so many stories about vampires. Stoker could have been referring to himself, as he also kept a candle lit by his writing table when he wrote his book. It's also important to know that when Stoker first saw Whitby Abbey, he was not even a grown up. In fact, he was only 10 years old. He only grew into the writer we know and love after a friend gave him the book Dracula. Whitby Abbey also has one of the most famous crypts in the country. There have even been some popular horror films filmed here. Dracula has never been filmed in Whitby before, and this is the best place to see his real life crypt. It's what the Melmoth the Wanderer visits in the novel. The crypts stand in the grounds of the ruins of Whitby Abbey and are now roofless. 5ec8ef588b
